Having designed for advertising agencies, startups, corporations, I often felt difficulty feeling fulfilled at the end of the week. Finding a place for design to truly make a difference in our world is no simple task, and I have always thrived when that beacon had some clarity.

Currently I'm working on improving the relationship of a whole country, through unbiased journalism and storytelling that shines a spotlight on the biggest stories just as much as the seemingly smaller ones. Through design I'm able to set my targets on not only having everyone's voice heard, but also ignite a hunger for collaboration between offices from coast to coast.

Airbnb.org sounds like a fantastic journey well on its way to creating those same bonds and strengths across a vast landscape, and I'm positive I would thrive in this role. My portfolio shows off much of my visual and interaction skills, but mentoring and really connecting with my peers (and those I've never met) is what I have found new virtue in.

I'd love to talk, and most importantly, learn more of what this endeavor means to Airbnb and how I can support that.

Always looking forward,

Kelly Keenan

PS - Toronto is basically the New York City of Canada, just with a bit more snow, and raccoons instead of rats.
